Teenagers from St Petersburg participate in international art project

Fifteen students from the St Petersburg Pedagogical College II have been taking part in a unique project which brings together young people from around the globe. Organised by Kiboko Projects, a non-profit organisation from New York and headed by photographer Mark Schellen, the project invites teenagers to create diaries about their lives and produce artwork. These materials then form an ongoing exhibition, archive and communication network that highlight the lives of young people in the world today.

Mr Schellen, who began the project in Kenya after first working with New York youngsters, says the aim of the growing project is aimed at providing an "educational, artistic and cultural exchange".

One of the activities completed by teenagers in Africa, the USA and Russia has been the making and decorating of masks. Mr Schellen said he has been fascinated that many of the St Petersburg participants chose to depict landmarks of the city on their masks – like the open bridge and Winter Palace square on the mask shown left.

The youngsters have also been given video cameras to make documentaries about their families and friends. All the material will be exhibited in New York, where Kiboko Projects has already received support from UNICEF. In 2002 the project will come back to St Petersburg where, in the run-up to the city's 300th Anniversary celebrations, the diaries, artwork and videos will be displayed at the Union of Artists exhibition hall.

Alevtina Kuzub, chair of the Art Department of the Pedagogical College II said selecting the 15 students was difficult because, as well as artistic talent, English-language skills were required. It is hoped two of the students will later accompany the project to New York.

Teenage journalists from Pyat Ugl'ov ('Five Corners') magazine have also been involved in documenting the progress of the project. When it is completed, each student will receive a bound and printed copy of their illustrated diaries. Two other copies will be made – one for the travelling exhibition and one for a special library.
